Jacky: This was a great experience. Yes, it's exactly what it sounds like -- you pay for picking up trash in the water. You become part of the city because of doing some good things to the place. This isn't a big company making a lot of money -- this is a group with a mission to clean the canals. Our family loved it -- we highly recommend it.

Kaiserin: Fishing for plastic on a boat made from recycled plastic bottles and seeing the city at the same time are great ways to get to know the city, make friends, and raise awareness of the problem of plastic pollution.

Kei Okamoto: This was a very fun boat-ride in the canals of Amsterdam. Let me be clear from the beginning. You pay to fish other people's trash from the water. The boat is smaller than most boats, so we were also able to get into the smaller canals. However, if you get seasick easily, you might want to think twice before joining the trip.

Sunny Y.: I enjoyed the idea of the plastic whale and watching others fish for plastic but I didn't like touching the plastic myself.

Ynzo: I live in Amsterdam, and I love the canals. I knew there was a lot of trash, but boating around with "Plastic Whale" showed me how much trash there actually is! It was nice to do something useful and fun at the same time.

If you ask any child in our Hope 4others program about the plans they have for their future, almost every student would share a goal that needs a university education. This is a big deal!

Children who grow up in a poor family have few chances to make their dreams come true. When your whole focus is simply having enough food or clothes, it seems like a waste of time to imagine a future different than what you already know... especially when no one else in your family has ever gone to university.

But the children in our program have a totally new vision! Being able to go to school and also get good care at the Care Points has changed their life. Now they can envision themselves building better futures.

Now, we need 1,200 more volunteers to join this program. Just sign in by email or call at (406) 618-2875. Or you can just donate surplus food by visiting us at 937 Minnesota Avenue San Jose, California-95125.
